Mark Spatz serves as Cohen & Gresser's General Counsel and as a partner within the firm's Litigation & Arbitration practice. He has a broad practice representing corporations, institutions, and individuals in a variety of complex matters, with a particular focus on commercial disputes and defending corporations and institutions in consumer class-action, product liability and mass tort litigation. In addition to managing all aspects of complex litigation, Mark works with clients to devise litigation strategies and large-scale complex settlement programs for multi-district actions, including playing a leading role in the representation of two international companies in mediations and settlement negotiations regarding thousands of lawsuits in large multi-forum products liability actions. He has both trial and appellate experience and has also served as the primary counsel on several arbitrations, including before the International Court of Arbitration. Mark also has experience conducting internal investigations on behalf of several corporate clients. He has been recognized by Best Lawyers in America in the product liability litigation - defendants category. Mark is further recognized as one of New York's Super Lawyers for civil litigation: defense.

Mark is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania Law School, where he was Associate and Senior Editor of the Journal of Constitutional Law, earned a Master of Bioethics from the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine, and graduated from Brown University with honors. Prior to joining the firm, he was a litigation associate at Kaye Scholer.
